In 1982, the first iteration of AutoCAD was completed and it was sold for $500,000. Initially, all training was provided to engineers. In 1982, AutoCAD was released to the general public. It is notable for the introduction of the parametric drafting feature, which allowed users to make complex, geometric designs with the click of a button, and became the focus of many popular software companies in the late 1980s. By 1990, Autodesk had expanded to over 1,000 employees, including 800 engineers. During this time period, AutoCAD became the de facto standard drafting software for most engineering firms. It started to see reduced sales as CAD programs such as Solidworks and CATIA (now known as CATIA V) began to gain momentum. In the early 2000s, Autodesk was bought by Carnegie Mellon University. As a result, the Carnegie Mellon University AutoCAD program was relocated to Carnegie Mellon University's Entertainment Technology Center (ETC) on the university's campus. On March 7, 2014, Autodesk announced that they would acquire Vectorworks and Symbols (which was formed as a spin-off of the AutoCAD team from Autodesk). The Vectorworks product line was closed and customers were automatically migrated to AutoCAD. On September 30, 2014, Autodesk announced that they would acquire Multimaker for $35 million.
