Naming has no connection with friendship. I prefer the name of In The Heat of Passion. Peter Briggs and this is his best book, black and white with sepia. In The Heat of Passion is a novel by young British author, Peter Briggs, with photographs by Karen Seabrook. Briggs sets.

Q: Connecting to two routers with one adapter I'm using a 500Mb/s adapter to connect two different routers. The first one runs a WAN DHCP server, and the second one has its own DHCP server as well. I use a config as follow to connect to the first router: auto br-lan iface br-lan inet dhcp gateway 192.168.1.254 address 192.168.1.21 netmask 255.255.255.0 and the same configuration for the second router. The problem is that the DHCP server of the first router seems to have a hard time getting the clients address (the second router) so I had to use static addresses on the clients. I use the terminal of the first router as the second router's modem. Is there a way to use only one adapter and connect to two routers with a single connection? Edit: I forgot to mention I use two routers with a manual IP address.

A: The problem was that the first router had firewall enabled and I think it was enabled to a specific mac address. I changed the MAC address of the modem to a specific mac address and it connected to both routers.

Q: Kill a linked server on database I'm using SQL Server and linked server. I'd like to take down the server side of a linked server connection. Is there a way to kill the linked server connection? There are multiple connections to the same server, so I can't just terminate it. Currently the only workaround I can think of is to run `sp_dropserver` , but that kills off the server instance and any databases that it has.

A: Check the status of the linked server before dropping it: `SELECT * FROM OPENQUERY (PRINT 'Dropping % linked server...', N'cmdserver', 'OLE DB providers for OLE DB;') ...` and then drop it when you're comfortable that the linked server is not running. There's a process named
