In the build we played, FIFA 22 introduces "HyperMotion Technology", which simulates the movement of all 22 players, which captures real-life data, based on an actual football match. We spoke to the FIFA community manager Cristiano Fornals after his preview, which included the new video on "HyperMotion Technology." For the first time in any sport, we are able to simulate the movement of every single player, using millions of data points collected from 22 football players at the highest level. That's because every player has worn a 'sensor ball' – a high-quality marker, which registers all touches in the area. The 'Sensor Ball' technology is offered by the same specialist who has developed the ProZone Infinity. The data captured in every single player movement is then consolidated into a single, 360° sphere of movement. And that's what allows us to simulate the movement of all players. Previous iterations of the FIFA games have used the Force Field System (FFS), which came with limitations for use with all players. For example, the ball could not be run past a defender, and players would be forced to turn around to make a run, which of course makes it hard for a player to perform his usual game. All of that has been changed with the introduction of the new HyperMotion Technology for FIFA 22. The system has been developed by the company. As an expert in the field, EA Sports understands the needs of both coaches and players. All 22 players now move with every single touch. Fornals also spoke about the new face ID and player models for FIFA 22. Fornals: "The face ID allows us to create a more individual face model for every player. The player models are now more detailed and even when they do not have their real jersey on, the face is still more realistic." Fornals: "The players also now walk more realistically. We went back to the original demo version with Steve Bould, and he was very happy with the performance of the players. We know that for FIFA 17 we were already very satisfied with the level of performance. But for FIFA 18, the ones who played it on the console said that the players are even better in FIFA 19. We work on improving the level of detail and the performance of every single player. Fornals: "
