Sports in conjunction with subject matter experts including England Women's and England Men's Team Head Coach Phil Neville, FIFA 20 COO Matt Bilbey, Academy Lead Dan Davidson, midfielder/defender Joe Willock and FIFA Ultimate Team Lead Producer Alex Evans. "The EA Sports team has always had amazing sensors, world-class computers and some of the best football talent in the world, but until now it hasn't been possible to harness all that into a game that's completely immersive," said Evans. "Making this technology work for the sport of football has been one of the most challenging tasks in video game development. We think we've cracked it, and this new technology, combined with all of our other gameplay innovations, will make FIFA the best football game in the world." Why it matters: It's not enough to just have a comprehensive roster of players, clubs, stadiums and the latest football boots. Now you can have the game interact with you in ways you never thought possible. Behind the scenes: From last summer's E3 reveal, the development team at EA Sports had their sights set on creating something game-changing in the world of football video games, and they delivered. Motion capture technology – first popularized by the successful Call of Duty franchise – allows teams of humans to be combined into a single unit called a Motion Sequence, or MS. The MS capture data from multiple actors, and once they're in the game, it can be used to power the different elements of the football experience. The heart of gameplay has been re-architected to make it play across a single MS. The result is that players feel more natural and fluid. Player moves have become more fluid. Tackles are more integrated into the gameplay. Movement from defenders to attackers is more intuitive. It's a more realistic experience that is built from the ground up. The other part of FIFA's new control system is unseen and yet essential. Players can now be taken out of the action if they think it best for the team. Team play is more important than ever, and part of that means being careful to protect players who are receiving instructions in the middle of a game, knowing they may have to step aside for the good of the team. Another important part of the MS is the pass. By
