The Empire is the most powerful empire ever to control the Known Universe. Its might is often enough reason enough for nations to band together and wish it ill. The Republic's control has been precarious, until now. Freedom fighters have captured the Empire's capital and thrown the vengeful minions of the night into hysteria. The bloodlust of Empire warriors is like nothing ever seen before. The Empire is facing its most perilous hour, unless the Republic can prevail. The Republic is a coalition of ethnic groups that has ousted the Empire from their homeland. It controls the eastern coastline of the Known Universe, but is small and fractured. The eastern states of the Republic need the Republic's help to face the Empire's most severe threat yet. The Empire's armies are strong, but the Republic's weapons are legendary. With a small number of survivors from an airborne assault, and some in a last stand charge, the Republic's forces have a small chance of victory. Their only chance at this is an air assault on a fortified and heavily defended Imperial capital. This aerial battle is long and bloody, but if the Republic can pull this off their victory is assured, but their success is far from certain. What will happen to the survivors and the rest of the Republic is uncertain. Will the empire prevail over the Republic and their allies in the bloodiest clash since the fall of the Death Ray Empire? This is the story of what happened before that. The Republic's attack was well timed, striking the empire on two fronts. The Capital is protected by superior forces that were expecting a ground invasion. Faced with an air assault, the defenses were overstretched. The Imperial capital was to be bombed on two fronts. The first strike was supposed to be a light one, a distraction meant to draw enemy forces into the north where the real attack would come from. This attack would attempt to saturate the capital and burn out the energy of the defenders. The main attack was to be a ground assault. The capital was to be blasted from the sky with a star destroyer and nuclear missiles. The capital would be left in ruins and in a state of constant chaos as the capital was being systematically blasted to pieces and the defenders were well out of range. When the Republic arrived, they bombed the capital from the skies. The capital felt the full brunt of their bombardment, but the defenders were caught in the open and hammered by superior firepower and suicidal tactics. A small contingent of soldiers from the Republic's elite Airborne

and the Treasure Treasure, a series of fantasy novels for children written by D. G. Hart. When the author read in a children's magazine that the title character had grown up in the Arizona desert, he attempted to write about that but found it difficult, and decided to write a fantasy world of his own. Trapper Knight, Sharpshooter Princess and the Treasure Treasure is the first book in a series. Every page contains children's drawings, which I enjoyed. Five little friends help solve a mystery. The two girls, from the desert, can shoot arrows as well as most warriors, but they are children. Their friend is a young hunter named Trapper Knight, who lives in the wilds and goes out at night to locate gnomes, trolls and boogins. The young hiker brother and sister, their names are also Trapper and Sharpshooter, are a study in contrasts. Young Trapper gets into adventures each day, while his sister spends her days alone in the forest by a stream, watching the birds and listening to the brook. The theme of the two characters is clearly drawn. Sharpshooter will question the readers as they try to follow her and Trapper Knights action through the story, as they need to have people to explain it to. To write a fantasy book for young children can be hard. How would the reader feel in a situation of having magic? In this book, the heroine is a young woman who relies on her arrows. Where would they be when there is no magic? Would she be allowed to shoot arrows? And how would the readers feel if she had to climb in and out of a basket? I appreciated the thoughtful answers and answers to these questions. I also appreciated that the heroine of the story, Sharpshooter, is able to share her thoughts with the reader, in the form of questions, and to answer the reader's questions. Starting in this book, the heroine starts to grow up, develops a personality and develops a sense of responsibility. This is a brave books, where heroic heroism is found in one character, while another character leaves them to die. Trapper Knight, the hero, makes mistakes and, though imperfect, is well-intended and has her own failings. I recommend Trapper Knight, Sharpshooter Princess and the Treasure Treasure book series as a wholesome story for young children who would enjoy the sense of adventure and adventure of it.
