Apparent age at first pregnancy (AAP) is inversely associated with breast cancer risk. However, the association with sporadic breast cancer is unknown. In a large population-based case-control study within the Sister Study, we evaluated the association between spontaneous first pregnancy prior to 35 years and sporadic breast cancer risk. We found a significant trend of decreased risk with increasing age at first pregnancy (adjOR 0.76; 95% CI 0.56-1.02) in ever-parous women.

In a subset analysis of 427 postmenopausal cases, we found increased risk for older age at first pregnancy (OR 1.92; 95% CI 1.17-3.16, comparing 35-39 vs. 15-24 years). In summary, these data provide the first evidence of an association between a marker of birth timing and sporadic breast cancer. The age at first pregnancy could be a useful epidemiologic factor to facilitate tumor subtype classification.

Cold-Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (CNMR) Spectroscopy of bio-organic species in tissues. Cold-Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (CNMR) spectroscopy is a method that can be used for in situ detection of organic molecules, free radicals and paramagnetic species in tissues. In this work, cyanine dyes, used as a model of bio-organic species, are shown to be useful probes for the CNMR spectroscopy. These compounds are able to diffuse and cross the plasma membrane to reach the intracellular space. The CNMR spectra of these compounds are obtained in the presence of chlorinated solvent using an echo planar imaging acquisition technique. The highest resolution is obtained when the gradient field of the spectrometer
