Post-transplant antibodies directed against antigens encoded by the major histocompatibility complex class I, II and class III in patients with multiple myeloma. Multiple myeloma (MM) is a neoplasm of bone marrow plasma cells and is a disease that is cured by allogeneic stem cell transplantation in approximately 30% of the patients. Anti-HLA antibodies (AHAs) are implicated in graft-vs.-host disease and may also contribute to immune evasion of myeloma cells. This study was performed to determine the frequency of anti-HLA antibodies, both pre- and post-transplant, in MM patients who underwent allogeneic transplantation (n = 26). To this end, we assessed the presence of pre- and post-transplant AHAs directed against HLA class I (A, B, C), class II (DR, DQ), and class III (Ig) molecules. Pre-transplant AHAs were detected in 11 (42%) patients and post-transplant in 15 (58%) patients; eight (31%) patients had more than one antibody. Seven (27%) patients had serum AHAs after the transplant, which were mainly directed against HLA class I and II molecules. No significant differences were found in the occurrence of post-transplant AHAs in relation to donor type (HLA-identical sibling vs matched unrelated donor) or conditioning regimen (MAC vs RIC). No association was found between the presence of post-transplant AHAs and survival time. These results are in accordance with those previously reported. Thus, the detection of pre- and post-transplant AHAs could help to identify patients at risk of acute GVHD and, consequently, to develop strategies to avoid this complication after transplant. DESCRIPTION: (Applicant's Abstract) The processes by which animals from a variety of phyla form attachments to each other's body surface have been at the focus of much attention in recent years. Despite a rich literature on this topic in several phyla, there is surprisingly little information about attachment in mammals. The aim of this proposal is to begin the process of

The Skreened Years The Skreened Years is a 2004 album by the British singer-songwriter Jon Langford, leader of the band the Mekons, released on his own independent record label Crooked Lake Records. It was his first solo album since 1998's My Name is Nobody: The Singles Collection. It was also the last album to feature bassist Nick Sheppard, who left the group in 2004. The album title refers to the uncertainty of art during the 1990s when the Mekons were working on and recording their next album. Langford himself was experiencing a nervous breakdown brought on by a series of personal problems, including the divorce of his first wife who had been born into a prominent political family, and the death of her mother. Langford was approached by Cherry Red Records, which released a compilation of Mekons discography titled The Mekons' Greatest Hits, which included songs from The Great Gospel Pop Spectacular and The Man Don't Give A Fuck, but Langford declined to be included on the album. Langford was also still linked to the "shuffling post-punk indie band called America", about which both the record label and Langford had no knowledge, but he was tight with its singer, Chris Garneau, who went on to join the Mekons as a full-time member, though he played on only one track on Langford's solo album. The album includes contributions from Richard Hawley (who also appears on Langford's previous
