If you are looking for a free online resource to understand Photoshop, check out CS6 for Beginners. The introduction chapter focuses on the core workflows and provides the foundation for the remaining chapters. Adding and removing backgrounds Before you start, we need to talk a bit about adding and removing backgrounds. Backgrounds are often the biggest hurdle for people who want to learn how to manipulate photographs in Photoshop. Photoshop has a learning curve to get over, but it can be done. Plus, it's sometimes easier to start with Photoshop than it is to start with a different program, like Adobe Lightroom, when you are first learning the basics of photography and editing. Adding backgrounds to your photographs is all about using the "Layer Styles" feature in Photoshop. Layers are a basic building block in Photoshop and they allow you to apply different styles and properties to different parts of your image. In the file you are working on, select your image layer. You can do this in your Layers panel, in the Layer Panel menu, or with keyboard shortcut L (default). Note that layers are always highlighted in the Layers panel, but the layer icon will disappear until you select it. If you are new to working with layers, select Layer → New → Layer. A new layer will be created in your current document. Now that you have an image layer selected, you can set properties for the layer. You can do this by selecting the Layer Styles tab in the Layers panel or by selecting Layer → Layer Style → New Style. To apply a new layer style to your image, you must first select a default style from the New Style tab of the New Style dialog box. Most people use the default settings, unless they know better. By default, every style is applied to all layers of your image. In this example, we will use the Black and White Style. Now you should have the following layers on your document: 1. Layer 2. Layer Background 3. Layer Mask To create a new layer style, navigate to the Type menu in the New Style dialog box and select Layer Styles from the menu. The New Layer Style dialog box will open with the Type tab selected. As with the New Layer dialog box, a Layer Style will appear. The first step to apply a layer style to your document is to select the layer you wish to style. You can

Our recent post on the new Soledad O'Brien interview garnered a pretty significant amount of attention. The reason: SOL! Below is a link to NPR's source, which was the transcript of the interview. The descriptions are from our post – read on for a non-techie's analysis of the text, and then you can follow the links for analysis in the original NPR article. Click the highlighted text on the right to see a transcription of what was said on the air. Basically, O'Brien says that the interview with Soledad was her first interview that was sensitive and she told this producer that she would talk on NPR more about emotional and personal health. She said that the producers assured her that the interview would be about health and "stay away from personal stuff." She added, "And I watched it and I'm like 'he just brought it back right down to a personal kind of thing' and I was like 'what!'" SOL said that she was unsure how this first interview would pan out. You can hear O'Brien's remarks right after the first 30 seconds of the clip and see O'Brien later in the clip telling the producer that she's "excited to talk about health issues." Dr. Oz is heard about 11 seconds into the clip before an audible can be heard on the air. So, O'Brien can clearly say that she wasn't sure if it was going to be a health interview. She's pretty clear that it wasn't. On the air, O'Brien called Dr. Oz's segment "an insult to the audience" and she spoke about what she feels they should talk about, and agreed that they did talk about mental health and that she feels well rounded. You can hear her earlier remarks about what she's going to focus on right after the clip. And you can hear her on the air saying she feels that what they did on air was well-rounded. So... This was a first interview. So what do you think? Was it a health interview or was it more of a personal kind of thing? Do you believe that she received the assurance that it would be a health interview? Did she clearly say that it wasn't? Tell me what you think!Related Articles

Social Sharing Hearing back from Bell's legal team about how 'serious' the breach was Selcuk Oztunc Usta, a professor at Ryerson University in Toronto, was one of hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached by Bell Mobility's servers. (Manuel Carrasquillo/CBC) Bell Canada has refused to pay for the storage of encrypted data belonging to hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached. That information — including names, addresses, phone numbers, email addresses and financial data — includes details about the users' family members as well as personal information on people between the ages of 18 and 65. Bell has faced increasing criticism over the breach, including calls for the company to return the money to affected customers. Earlier this month, nearly 30 organizations and companies signed a letter calling for Bell to make good on its promise of free lifetime storage of personal information it had collected on customers. A few weeks later, Bell's lawyers went before a Montreal court — taking the unusual step of appearing in person — to ask a judge to reject a class-action lawsuit brought by dozens of affected Canadians, and to cancel any class actions or demands for monetary compensation. The request to set aside the lawsuit on grounds of jurisdictional issues was quickly granted by the Superior Court judge, essentially killing the class-action lawsuit. "It was a really bizarre and creepy situation," said Toronto lawyer Ralph Lean, who represents the class of affected Canadians in his firm's class actions practice. Bell's lawyer, John MacKinnon, told the court that while he had intended to walk into court with a neutral position, he ended up siding with his clients. "The issue is so fundamental that we wanted to ensure that the court got the complete picture as to why these people should not get their day in court," he said. A Bell lawyer with notebooks filled with information after his appearance at the Superior Court in Montreal. (Submitted by Lean Law) Hearings to determine a compensation amount are expected in the near future. The company said earlier this month that customers affected by the breach might see a credit on their bill. The issue is so fundamental that we wanted to ensure that the court got the complete picture - Bell's lawyer In the meantime, however, Bell does not intend to provide compensation. "We need to ensure that any compensation we pay to a person is fair and not
