Why does it do that? Why is it that any tool can be used as a "straw"? There are quite a few reasons. But the chief reason is that Photoshop's creative and design tools do the job. When I worked in an editorial product group at a high-end publisher, a graphic designer once told me that some editors were resistant to the introduction of new digital technology that allowed the editors to manipulate images and print layouts without having to rely on the graphic designer's assistance. The graphic designer then suggested using PS as a "back door" into the department, and by saying, "I'm just showing them a trick; if they want more work, they can hire me," it would work to her advantage to keep the graphics department on the project. Photoshop is my go-to tool, and if you use any type of tool, it is important that you know how to get the most out of it. What does that mean? It is not your company's tool. It is not your company's job to fight against the creation of images in any tool—it is your job to use the tools you are provided to get the job done. Advertisement I am not saying that you shouldn't use Photoshop, or any of the other tools available in this article. On the contrary, I'm saying that if you are going to be an "image manipulator" or "graphic designer," you need to know what Photoshop is doing. You need to know what the other tools are doing and be able to combine them. You need to be able to do what a graphic designer would do with just a pen and paper. Most graphic designers aren't going to sit you down and give you a lecture on lighting or composition. Photoshop (or a similar program) is going to teach you those things. It is a company's tool, and you need to know how to use it. A key thing to remember is that Photoshop is almost always the king of the digital imaging world, and it is your job to use it. Here are some of the reasons Photoshop is the king: 1. It is powerful. Let me put it this way: If you type "create" into Google, the first result is normally a dictionary definition. If you type "create" into Google, the first result is typically Photoshop. Advertisement Adobe is the company that essentially created Photoshop. In 1994, Adobe began to sell Photoshop as a general

Using Photoshop Elements doesn't require anyone to be an expert to get the job done. If you're new to Photoshop, or you're looking for an alternative to Photoshop, this article is for you. The five key features of Photoshop Elements are explained below. Edit Images When you take a photo or screenshot, then use the Edit Images feature to clean up the image. You can adjust the levels, exposure, brightness, color balance, and contrast. If you prefer, you can use the Graduated Filter, which contains over 25 filter presets, to give the photo a particular look. You can also use the Spot Healing Brush to fill in missing areas in the photo and apply a simple retouch filter. Adjust the Color If the photograph is yellow, then you can use the Hue/Saturation adjustment to change the color to a different one. You can also go further to use the Color Mixer or Mixer Panel to mix two or more colors. Rotate, Resize, and Cropping With the rotating, resizing and cropping features, you can re-size an image, rotate the photo 90 degrees, and crop the photo to make it fit the screen. Capture, Edit & Save Capture a photo or drag a photo from your computer directly into the editor. You can use the Adjustment panel to edit the photo or use the Spot Healing Brush to fix small issues. You can then save it or save it as a copy. Get started with Photoshop Elements today. Photoshop Elements vs Photoshop You might be wondering which is better, Photoshop Elements or Photoshop. The answer is simple, it depends on what you want to do. Adobe Photoshop is a professional photo editing software with a large user base. Photoshop has advanced features such as the Content Aware Patch, Vignette, Lens Correction and others. Adobe Photoshop has the power to transform photos or create new ones. On the other hand, Adobe Photoshop Elements is simpler than the professional version and has fewer features. It is ideal for photographers, graphic designers and hobbyists. If you're new to Photoshop Elements, you'll want to use it. You can always later upgrade to the professional version to get all the advanced features. Buy Adobe Photoshop Elements The latest version is called Adobe Photoshop Elements 19. It contains a complete set of the original Elements 05a79cecff

Q: Is it possible to have a for loop nested in a switch statement? Say I have multiple cases for a switch statement, and that I want the for loop to run if a particular case is satisfied: case1: for (something) { } case2: for (something else) { } case3: for (my last something) { } Is it possible to do this in one shot, maybe using something like case1||2||3? A: You can use the || operator, but the for loop must run in the same execution block: case1: //run for loop break; case2: //run for loop break; case3: //run for loop break; If you want to be able to nest the code within the same switch statement, you would have to use an ugly workaround by using a boolean flag to detect if the loop is done. Update: now after you cleared up some of the specifications it's a bit clearer what's wanted. In that case (and assuming there are no other cases) the following is a possible workaround: boolean done = false; switch (parameter) { case1: while (!done) { //code } break; case2: while (!done) { //code } break; case3: while (!done) { //code } break; //other cases } Please note that this is not thread-safe as far as the done variable is concerned. If that's a problem in the use-case it might have to be refined further.

"If he's ruling fairly, and that's how I look at it, there's no reason to prevent him from doing what he's doing" Obama administration official President Barack Obama's high-level campaign arm has been secretly financing the efforts of millions of Democrats across the country to thwart a Republican-led attempt to block Obama's choice for director of the Central Intelligence Agency, several senior administration officials said. Four officials in the Obama re-election campaign told The Washington Post that the White House has been secretly providing $10-million-a-month to far-flung Democratic groups, including super PACs, that are spending hundreds of millions of dollars against GOP Senate candidates deemed "extreme." In all, the Obama campaign has donated about $100-million to various Democratic groups since the 2012 election, the Post reported. The $10-million-a-month ad buys from the White House are being used to air television spots calling out Republicans who are seeking to block CIA nominee John Brennan over his role in the use of enhanced interrogation techniques on terrorists. The spots are running in states like Alaska, Nebraska and North Dakota. Another campaign official, who is also one of Obama's closest White House advisers, said the White House is unsure how much of its money will be spent on the operation as most of it comes from the president's re-election fund, not the campaign's general treasury. Asked whether the administration is still concerned about "inaction creep" where Democrats might use the 2010 Intelligence Committee report on the use of torture as a political weapon against Republicans, the senior administration official said that "if he's ruling fairly, and that's how I look at it, there's no reason to prevent him from doing what he's doing." The official said that the White House never discussed its tactics with the Democratic groups, saying it is "beyond the point" where anyone in the White House can find out who the groups are. "It's one of those things where we don't know what's going on except for us," the official said. "This is not how the White House would operate." Facing an uphill battle against the Republican Senate campaign committee, Democrats are looking to turn the tables on the GOP and take control of Congress in 2014. According to the senior administration official, the White House's strategy is simple: "Make the Senate race ugly enough that it actually costs some of these candidates money," the official said.
