I'm reading through Delphi's TWin32API on the Internet and came across some documentation for the CopyFile() function that uses these 2 operator overloads for CopyFile. These are the operator overloads and their associated docs (from Wikipedia): bool operator = (const char *filename) This operator overload allows comparing an operating system file path to the C string "filename". (string.operator =) This operator overload allows assigning a C string to the field name (variable) filename in an operating system file path. Why are there 2 of these operators and what is the difference between them? A: The original operator bool operator = (const char *filename) is a "compare by string" operator. I.e. it compares the value of the string variable (which is a string) to the string "filename". The overload (string.operator =) is a "convert to string" operator. That means it converts the string variable (which is a string) into a string (which is a pointer to an array of char). This pointer is then casted to the type of the string variable. Now your question is, why do you need to cast it to the type of the d0c515b9f4
