The present invention relates to a polychromatic image reading apparatus having a plurality of photoelectric reading elements for reading a document. A typical photoelectric reading apparatus is formed of a photodetector array element which senses the image of a document and a charging device for uniformly charging the surface of the photodetector array element. In the apparatus, the photodetector array element is normally implemented using a line type CCD (Charge Coupled Device) or a line type CIS (Contact Image Sensor). To read a document, the photodetector array element is moved relative to the document to scan the same. In the scanning, desired information is obtained by raster scanning the photodetector array element to detect a output signal of each of the photodetector array element elements. The information represented by the output signals is then fed to and stored in a computer or a printer. The photodetector array element is required to be smaller in size, lighter in weight, and have a higher sensitivity to provide a brighter output signal in order to meet the recent demands of the compact size of such apparatus, higher resolution, and enhanced reading speed. A prior art polychromatic image reading apparatus is disclosed in a Japanese Patent Application laid open under Publication No. 56-134693. In the apparatus, one photodetector array element is provided for each of three spectral bands including red, green, and blue bands so that three documents are scanned by moving the photodetector array element and the three documents are optically read using the three spectral bands, respectively. Another polychromatic image reading apparatus is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,246,409. In this apparatus, three sensors are arranged for corresponding to the three spectral bands, respectively, and each sensor receives the reflected light of a corresponding spectral band. The three sensors are connected to a single signal processing circuit so that the three sensors are simultaneously read for obtaining a single color image. The prior art apparatus as mentioned above requires three sets of scanning apparatus and photodetector array elements which makes the whole apparatus large in size and expensive. The device as disclosed in the Japanese patent application is designed to read only colored documents and not colored documents having different colors, e.g., red documents or blue documents, respectively. In the case of non-colored documents, the device requires three sets of a photodetector array element for scanning each color of documents. The color document reading device of the
