IBM SPSS Statistics 17.0 Full Cracked Version DownloadMinute and transient expression of a vasopressin-like neuropeptide in the molluscan brain. The neuropeptide arginine-vasopressin (AVP) is an important neuromodulator of both cardiovascular and endocrine functions in the vertebrate brain. It is expressed in the central nervous system of several species, including the planorbis clam, where its expression and function are not known. We show here that an AVP-like neuropeptide is found in the central nervous system (CNS) of the purple gunshell mollusc, Lottia gigantea. By double-labelling immunohistochemistry, the AVP-like peptide was found to be synthesized and stored in neurons located in the deutocerebrum, as well as in several sensory ganglia. AVP-like immunoreactive fibers were also observed in the deutocerebrum, where they were associated with neurons of two different types. The neurons associated with the peptide (in the deutocerebrum) are termed AVP cells and are the major group of peptidergic neurons in the brain of the purple gunshell. Interestingly, AVP-like immunoreactive ganglion cells of the cerebral ganglia, in addition to their peptidergic properties, are also assumed to be mechanosensory in nature. The question is raised as to the biological significance of the AVP-like neuropeptides in the mollusc CNS, where it is found, and whether any of their functions are similar to those of their vertebrate counterparts.
