Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of preparing printing inks. More particularly, it relates to a method of preparing a colored pigment dispersion, which is particularly suited to the preparation of inks with enhanced glossiness. 2. Description of the Related Art To be able to obtain a printed image with high color brilliance such as high glossiness and high brightness, the printed image must be colored as highly as possible. To obtain a printed image that is colored as highly as possible, a high color brilliance ink that is prepared by dissolving a water-insoluble or only slightly water-soluble dye in an aqueous solvent to form a colored pigment dispersion is often used. Typically, as the aqueous solvent for preparing the colored pigment dispersion, a water-soluble solvent is used. The pigment dispersion prepared by using a water-soluble solvent generally has a small particle size. However, since the use of a water-soluble solvent allows the particle size of the colored pigment dispersion to be reduced, the image obtained by using this colored pigment dispersion has low color brilliance. On the other hand, an aqueous solvent is known to effectively disperse a pigment when compared to other solvents. In addition, a dye is readily dissolved in an aqueous solvent. In view of these properties, it is preferable to use an aqueous solvent for the preparation of a colored pigment dispersion. A general method of preparing the colored pigment dispersion using an aqueous solvent involves adding pigment particles to an aqueous solvent containing a dispersant and dispersing the pigment particles together with the dispersant. A dispersant which increases the viscosity of the aqueous solvent and which interacts with the pigment particles is preferably used. However, a relatively large amount of the dispersant is generally added in order to improve the dispersibility. Therefore, it is difficult to prepare a colored pigment dispersion in which the effect of the dispersant is sufficiently exhibited by the amount of the dispersant. As a result, the dispersion state of the pigment particles is likely to be poor, leading to the presence of large aggregate particles in the
