Lightroom 5. And the new Lightroom mobile app. OK, so this wasn't supposed to be a review of Lightroom 5: I like the Lightroom 5. But I need to give a shoutout to Lightroom mobile. It's a responsive image editor that not only introduces a new user-interface for mobile editing, but also offers a few features, such as Snapshots, that, to me, add to the mobile editing experience. However, the upgrade to Lightroom 5 leaves a few aspects of the new mobile app as anticipated: For one, you can still edit pictures on the go. But the app takes on a bit of a different appearance. All the original editing features are still present. For example, you can still add points of interest like Distress Edges, Brightness & Contrast adjustments and Color Enhancers. (If you're interested in a bit more technical information on all these, you can find an explanation with a brief overview of Lightroom on CreativeBench.) Likewise, the interface is laid out in a similar way. All the positions for canvas size are still present. There are also the same menu items as before, such as Indicate Adjustment, Erase Edges, Styles, Presets and Live View. To use these, you still need to scroll up or down in the same way. The entire interface is also completely responsive. Just like Lightroom 5, Lightroom mobile is also mobile-device friendly as it works on Android phones and tablets as well as iOS. My only concern is that Lightroom mobile might not provide all the editing options on both devices. However, since I haven't noticed any such differences, I don't believe that's the case. Regardless, as with the original Lightroom, you can perform Lightroom mobile edits on the go. If you want to be accurate, you only need to use the latest Android version of Flash and ensure that your device has at least a 2.3 GHz processor. Nevertheless, this makes Lightroom mobile a great solution when you're on the go.
