For some, both Apple and Adobe are seen as lacking because of the way their products are priced. I don't think they are. There are other aspects to consider, like usability and compatibility, for example. I think Apple, in particular, beat both Adobe and myself to the ball. Apple certainly has a lock on designing the quintessential consumer product, and it is a smart move to have made with the iPod versus the competition. What a great product it is. However, I feel Adobe could have and should have done a much better job of taking advantage of the competition in the digital world. I mean, after all, we now have some powerful tools, most notably Apple's Photos, but in many cases, they simply lack the polish of Photoshop and Lightroom. After all, most of us can use Apple products because of their DIY capabilities, which is far superior to a lot of the competition. However, what of the consumer? Adobe makes it all about the consumer, after all, and it has been for some time now, but when it comes to making digital touchups, Adobe is still behind. Case in point is its current natural and photo image retouching interface (think "Paint"). Some of the features of Elements are very compelling for the new user, but they aren't ideal for seasoned pros, and I for one believe this will lose Adobe the professional market-share, a move which I bet Apple would never make. That brings me to the second complaint I have about the current state of Adobe programs. They are certainly booming in sales, at least if you look at Advertising and Affiliate Manufacturers and Not For Profits (NFPs), each are making a lot of money selling Photoshop and Lightroom. So that's fine.
